Thin film magnetic heads for disk drives are conventionally fabricated by first forming an array of ferrite/composite/plastic structures. Each structure comprises a raised portion for carrying a magnetic transducer over a magnetic disk, a lower portion for carrying read and/or write coils, and an insulating structure between the magnetic transducer and the coils. In the finished heads, the structures are typically separated by ceramic bars having a diameter of about 150 microns. Individual magnetic heads are built on multiple wafers that are diced to form individual composite heads. When complete, the head is inserted into a bore in a ceramic base plate to form a completed head. During fabrication, alignment between head and base plate is critical. The completed head is generally composed of a lower portion having a lower magnetic transducer and/or coil carrier, which is separated from an upper portion having an upper magnetic transducer and/or coil carrier. The base plate is generally located outside the finished head and the lower portion. Production defects occur at the edges of wafer layers, as well as at the surfaces of individual layers. Conventional inspection systems (such as those used in semiconductor wafer inspection) are not well suited to detecting defects in the finished head having dimensions of approximately 150 microns. The magnetic heads are on the order of several microns in thickness.
