One of the biggest stadium stories of 2016 came when the Philadelphia Eagles, the NFL's first 2018 expansion team, agreed to lease Lincoln Financial Field and the adjacent 76-acre site, known as the Schuylkill Yards, to a group of developers. The new owners will turn the complex into a center for entertainment, tourism and sports. They're planning a $1.4 billion project that will include shops, restaurants, hotels, housing, and perhaps a stadium with a retractable roof. "It will be a transformative project, and will have a significant impact on the region," Andy Terhaar, the president of The Philadelphia Sports & Entertainment Group, told me recently. Terhaar heads up the consortium that includes the Philadelphia Eagles, the PHL Club, Centerplate, Pepsi, and Blank, Gold & Bennett, the planning, architecture and construction firm behind the $1.16 billion Phillies' Citizens Bank Park. It's the same group that will handle the renovations at Lincoln Financial Field. The project's already well under way, with the main work completed on the Schuylkill Yards. New buildings like Ed Hall Plaza are going up, and major improvements are being made to Old Orchard, which includes the 72-year-old Veterans Stadium. (Come for the food and drink, stay for the craft beer and decidedly American-style football.) This summer, the NFL's second-oldest stadium will be renovated into a training facility for the Eagles, who play in the modern Millennium Stadium in Cardiff, Wales. The whole thing will be ready for the start of the 2018 NFL season, with the new Eagles Stadium -- which, for the record, we think we like the name -- opening the following year. It's a remarkable achievement for a project that will require an enormous investment and keep investors, sponsors, and businesses in Philadelphia's bustling sports economy on the forefront. "It's going to be something completely unique in Philadelphia, and the part that really excites us is that you're going to walk in and you can go shopping at Pitts," Terhaar said, meaning the shopping district will be modeled after a sports-oriented version of Pitts, the emporium-filled mall just outside the home of the NFL's Pittsburgh Occl3bf012
