Rating: 4.0 out of 5[A surgical case of suprasellar desmoplastic infantile astrocytoma: the importance of cranial MRI]. A five-month-old boy was admitted to our hospital with a complaint of visual impairment. He was diagnosed as having a suprasellar mass, which occupied the sella turcica and extended into the left and right cavernous sinuses. A computed tomographic (CT) scan and angiography showed severe edema of the optic nerves and arteries and no evidence of a venous obstruction. A suprasellar tumor was observed in the plain brain CT scan, but cranial magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) showed the tumor, which was enhanced after gadolinium administration, in the suprasellar region extending into the left and right cavernous sinuses. It also showed a hyperintense area in the subarachnoid space. Surgical exploration showed that the tumor had invaded the optic nerves and the left optic tract. The histological diagnosis was desmoplastic infantile astrocytoma. The tumor was small and non-infiltrative in the beginning, but gradually extended to the optic tracts, and finally grew into the left cavernous sinus. It is, therefore, important to perform cranial MRI in order to examine the brain precisely. Osteoprotegerin in the aqueous humor and plasma of patients with newly diagnosed uveitis. Increased levels of osteoprotegerin (OPG) have been shown in aqueous humor and peripheral blood of patients with autoimmune uveoretinitis. The aim of this study was to analyse whether OPG levels in the aqueous humor

System Requirements For MRDNotes:

Not a lot of demands are placed on the hardware system, you simply need a standard 8 bit microcontroller with a serial port. The program can be written to either an AVR with 16 MHz oscillator or to a STM32 microcontroller with its own free running oscillator. The program needs to be compiled using the avr-gcc. For the hardware I've decided to use a STM32L152RG with a RTC module to allow the program to run for any amount of time. I've chosen this processor and RTC module combination for two reasons.
