In the past, in order to provide a drink receptacle for holding beverages for an individual while working, such as in an office, an outdoor location, or the like, a person may have been required to carry a number of containers or cups to the location where the beverages are to be dispensed. In an example of this, the user may have been required to carry a number of single serving beverages to the location. Also, in another example, the user may have been required to carry a number of individual cups which are each individual enough to receive only a small quantity of beverage. In this case, the user would have to pour a small quantity of beverage into the individual cups. In such cases, in order to avoid carrying and pouring a number of single serving containers, or to avoid pouring a number of cups, it has been known to have a dispenser that holds a number of individual small containers so that, when a single container is desired, it is removed from the dispenser and the desired amount of beverage is poured from the container into a receptacle. Examples of such a system are shown in U.S. Pat. No. 2,978,581 issued in 1961 to McNally et al. and U.S. Pat. No. 4,557,223 issued in 1985 to Sides et al. A problem with such containers, however, is that they are typically configured in a format that allows only a single container of beverage to be poured into the drink receptacle. In some cases, the containers or cups may be removed from the receptacle and carried to another location, such as a picnic site, for a second drink, such that the person must carry the containers or cups to the location. In many cases, the user is limited to a single container for the single drink that is poured from the container because a single container is required to be only a small enough container to avoid spilling the entire volume of beverage when pouring
